also attended. Taylor reviewed the Committee's preliminary conclusions from its study and asked for our comments. Principal conclusions included that each U.S. Government entity involved does a good job individually in carrying out its responsibilities to combat international terrorism but that the entities do not work well together; the inter-Agency working group is only directed toward responding to incidents, it does not take a preventative approach; there is a lack of leadership problem, as most entities look toward NSC for leadership but NSC looks to State. Complicating this is the fact that there have been five different leaders of the inter-Agency group in two years. Finally, there have been no simulations of terrorist incidents which the staff feels would very much aid the inter-Agency group when they are confronted with actual terrorist incidents.

Senate Select Committee on Intelligence staff, and asked her to see how many of the 43 unclassified reports on Soviet defense spending, which had been sent to the Committee for distribution to Senators, were still available. I offered to make up the difference. Forty-three studies had apparently been received by the Committee before the letter explaining they were to be distributed to Senators and they were subsequently passed around to the Committee staff.

Bill Miller, Staff Director, Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, who requested that an Agency spokesman brief the Committee this week on three topics: "spy war," i.e., exchange of Soviet and American agents; the discovery of the antenna in the chimney of the U.S. Embassy in Moscow; and the Anatoly Shcharansky case.
